

Excursion to Bollingen Tower

C.G. Jung purchased the land in the village of Bollingen on the shore of the Obersee (upper lake) basin of Lake Zürich in 1922 after the death of his mother. In 1923, he started to build a small castle on this land. It was a stone structure suitable to be lived in. Additions were constructed in 1927, 1931, and 1935, resulting in a building that has four connected parts, and four towers. A second level was added to the 1927 addition after the death of Jung's wife in 1955, signifying "an extension of consciousness achieved in old age." For much of his life, Jung spent several months each year living at Bollingen. The Tower is now owned by a family trust and is not open to the public.
